I received some terrible news this morning regarding the loss of someone instrumental in my life in many ways. The following is a letter I wrote in response to one received by his wife with the sad news. I'm posting it here because this is how I cope. I write and I play. You won't be able to hear what I am playing, but you're welcome to read what I write. Be happy and safe this Memorial Day weekend. Friends never let friends drive drunk. EVER!!!! Jen, Thank you for replying. Joe and I met in high school where we became fast friends for we shared a common interest in music and drinking. Joe also had a love for motorcycles and driving fast. He was insane when it came to motorcycles or drilling a receiver trying to catch a pass going across the middle. I never met anyone who could hit harder. He was tough.... I mean REALLY tough. But his physical toughness paled in comparison to his mental toughness and determination. Now, THAT was something to behold. I was also the last person to ever see Joe walk. I was with him drinking at my house when he climbed onto that bike and zoomed off out of my driveway heading for home. A short 25 minutes later I heard sirens but thought nothing of it. Joe would have been long home and in bed by then, he lived less than five minutes away, and although Joe was insane on a bike, he always made it home. I got a call around 11 am the next morning with the terrible news and carried a heavy burden for a long time after. It was because of Joe that I got my first guitar and started learning to play and still do. You see, he had this electric guitar and could play the intro to Crazy Train by Ozzy. I remember thinking that was the coolest thing in the world. A few weeks later it became apparent that guitar is much harder than it looks and it seemed like he had given up on it. I asked if I could buy it off him. He said sure, and he sold it to me. As I learned and got better, I think he sort of got mad at himself for giving
